CV: Amit Srivastava is the Director (India) for the Centre of Asian and Middle Eastern Architecture (CAMEA) based at the University of Adelaide, in Australia. Having trained and practiced as an architect in India, Srivastava's primary research focuses on the architectural and construction histories of colonial and postcolonial India. His recent book India: Modern Architectures in History (Reaktion, 2015), with co-author Peter Scriver, offers a long history of the development of modern architecture in the subcontinent from the colonial period to the present. He has subsequently been studying the contributions of Indian construction companies during this period both within the subcontinent and across the Indian Ocean world, from Africa and the Middle East to South East Asia and Australia. In that regard, his current research focuses on the themes of transnational exchange of materials, skills, and construction processes across the Global South, with special interest in cases of South-South cooperation. Srivastava has been an active member of the Society of Architectural Historians Australia New Zealand (SAHANZ) and the European Architectural History Network (EAHN), for several years now, and has more recently served on the Scientific Committee and Chaired a Thematic Session at the 6ICCH in Brussels.
